The King and the Nameless Stone

A king holds a cup of the finest wine,
While his soldier bleeds on the front lines.
He toasts to the glory and peace of the land,
With no trace of blood on his manicured hands.

He sleeps in the warmth of a silk-covered bed,
Far from the ghosts of the innumerable dead.
But deep in the woods where brambles grow wild,
Lies the frozen heart of a mother's lost child.

No copper was spared for an epitaph or name,
Just a hollow in the earth for a life lost in flames.
He died in a whisper- a name not a prayer-
Then vanished like smoke in the bitter night air.

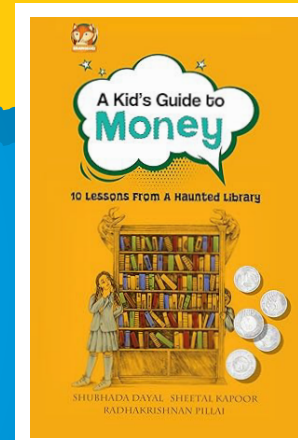

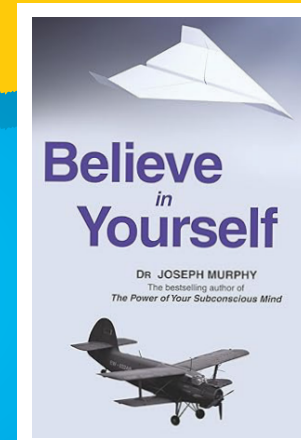

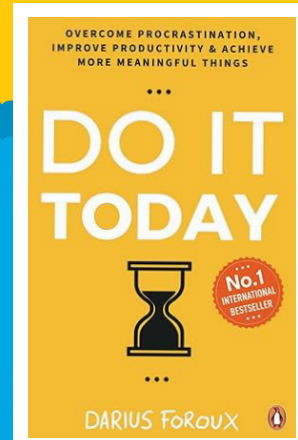

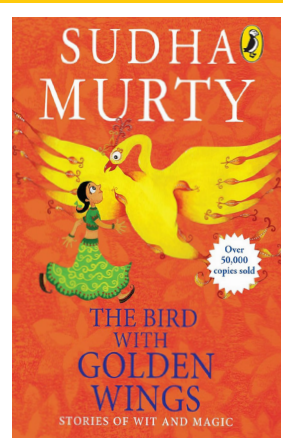

The king wears a mantle, the soldier wears dirt.
One gains worship, the other gains hurt.
The crown is adorned with stolen young breaths,
A fortress built on numerous, quiet deaths.

For, the king is a statue- aloof and cold,
While his soldier is an ACHE, written in bold.
One is a song sung at a newborn's birth
The other is a secret buried deep beneath the earth.

While the king counts his jewels in a fever of pride,
The world has forgotten the boy at his side.
